Company Description
NortonLifeLock, formerly known as Symantec Corporation prior to the sale of the Symantec name and enterprise business to Broadcom, is now headquartered in Tempe, AZ. Following the sale, which was completed in November 2019, the company emerges focused on the consumer cybersecurity business. The Norton product focuses on device security and offers capabilities like malware prevention. LifeLock addresses Identity Theft Protection.

Investment Thesis
Refocusing on Consumer Security. After divesting the Information Management business (Veritas) in January 2016 and the sale of its enterprise business to Broadcom in November 2019, NortonLifeLock is now focused on consumer security, which should allow management to concentrate on stabilizing and growing the historically margin-rich consumer business, and introducing new products to return the company to growth.

Growing consumer awareness of cyber security. Recent data breaches at companies like Capital One and Equifax have exposed vast amounts of consumer data to bad actors. These breaches, and others like them, have been highly publicized, which we see as improving consumer awareness around topics like personal cybersecurity. Increased awareness around consumer cybersecurity, especially regarding identity fraud protection, could serve as a catalyst for NortonLifeLock to grow given its competitive suite of consumer security offerings and brand recognition.

Transitioning consumer business. While NortonLifeLock’s margin-rich consumer business has not shown significant growth in recent quarters, management remains optimistic for the segment’s return to improved growth and has continued investment in the space with the LifeLock acquisition. While execution challenges and negative exposure from a deflationary PC market could pose risks, NortonLifeLock now has an opportunity to focus exclusively on growing its high-margin consumer business, which could help improve growth.

Leveraging consumer business model. NortonLifeLock’s consumer business has traditionally demonstrated strong operating margins (~48% adjusted operating margin in FY19). Despite being roughly half of NortonLifeLock’s revenue in its most recently completed fiscal year it contributed a substantial majority of the operating profit relative to the now-sold enterprise business. Assuming NortonLifeLock is able to effectively manage stranded costs following the sale of the enterprise segment, this operating leverage should serve the company well in the long-term.

Valuation. Our price target of $24 is based upon an estimated ~13.7x CY21E EV/EBIT, a discount to a consumer-focused peer group trading at a median ~17x CY21E EV/EBIT, which we see as justified given lower expected growth vs. peers and the ongoing transition following the acquisition.

Risks & Caveats
Macroeconomic uncertainty. As a consumer-focused business, NortonLifeLock’s results will be influenced by consumer spending habits. While its products may benefit when there is a strong consumer spending environment or other helpful macroeconomic forces, like a major data breach, consumers may be less willing to spend money on security in more difficult times when they may have more immediate expenses to pay.
Competition. NortonLifeLock competes with other companies in the consumer security market. For example, companies like McAfee and Trend Micro, among others, offer consumer anti-virus products that compete with the company's Norton product. Similarly, a variety of other companies offer identity theft protection services that compete with LifeLock. Ultimately, NortonLifeLock's long-term success in part depends on its ability to differentiate its offerings from those of its competition.

Deflationary PC market. NortonLifeLock has substantial exposure to PCs, particularly through its Norton anti-virus product serving the consumer market. While NortonLifeLock has been transitioning its portfolio towards higher growth markets, the PC end market has seen deteriorating conditions in recent years.

Transition risks. NortonLifeLock has significant stranded costs from the enterprise business after its sale of that unit. The company is working to eliminate these costs over the year following the sale, but if the company fails to reduce these costs or establish operating margins at targeted levels it could have a negative effect on the stock and long-term model outlook.
